The demands on them are hard to understand, let alone to meet in a therapeutic setting. We have a health care system that has developed a complicated code of silence for those who care. The health care system does not communicate well with itself and often treats professionals as if they are criminals. The health care system is populated by thousands of ordinary people who, while they are good at what they do, are not trained in the theories and philosophies of health care or the paradigms of the human condition. We have learned a great deal about human physiology and the biological causes of disease, but we have learned very little about the psychological, sociological, and spiritual forces that are counterbalancing and nullifying healing of human beings. There is a great opportunity for our health care system to break the code of silence, become more open, transparent, and accountable. Our health care system is in serious trouble if we do not. Medicine has made amazing strides in reducing the fatalities from disease. In one generation, we have gone from having 100,000 or more fatalities a year from surgical or medicinal complications to having about 25,000 deaths in any given year. But, our health care system has not provided adequate communication or access to care for the 100,000 nonfatal life-threatening conditions and diseases that haunt us.
